Sail Ho!

I heard a rustle in my garden patch-I saw a shadow how beneath my thatch-One morning while the dawn was breaking fast; And, coming near, a nervous hand was passed Accuss my face, and some one hade me wake, And -hasten to the cliff, for Heaven's sake : A sail was shining in the eastern sea ! " "A sail : " I gasped ; "the Saints compassion me. Go you and fire the signal-pyre!" I said. The shadow turned, and in a moment fied; And soon I followed-pale, and scant of breath-For on that chance was staked my life or death. I skirted the long shore of the bagoon, Shining and moist-shaped like a crescent moon-And scaled the rocky buttlements that rise, Like a great wall, against the eastern skies. The morning air blew down a fragrant whiff, Combing the wind-burnt grasses on the cliff. The cactus' thousand thorny palms were spread Against a sun-cloud hanging, hot and red, In the horizon; and a little way Off, in the bright, bine depths of dawning day, A fair and flickering atom-str-like, pale-I saw a sole and solitary sail. Then, down I sat, and prayed. The biting fire Carled the green balsams of my signal-pyre, And sent a bold, black shaft into the air, That towered above the shadows, and grew fair Like to a palm in stature, full of grace, Waving its suble plumes before the face Of all the world; and, as it would appear, Commanding that the voyager should draw near. I shot away the sight, in deep suspense, Half-drugged with the rich odors of the dense And multiplying furnes that hung about, And half-afraid to struggle with my doubt, The sun arose, and all the world was gay ; The sweet winds sprised the mists away.

-Overland Monthly for July.

I lifted up my eyes, where I was bowed,

And, through the portals of a golden cloud,

Frimming her sails, and making for the land

Beheld the vessel, by fair breezes famued,

And I was sure my banishment was o'er,

And loved my Island dearer than before!

Somehow I was not happy-for I grew

So lealous of the solitude I knew.

European Correspondence-No. 6. Paris, May, 1870.

In the multitude of official and semi-officia addresses, M. Ollivier has unfortunately, in a letter to his constituents, touched a sore point, when he hopes that the result of the vote will be a tranquil future, " in order that on the throne, as in the most humble dwelling, the son may succeed the father in peace." This paragraph has naturally excited the wrath of those who repudiate "the enormous faith of many made for " The throne of France is not an affair of civil right or the private property of any dynasty. plebiscite, this civil war without arms, is but a renewal of the bail of the Tuileries to the Napoleons, of the promissory note. The Tuileries has been more a tomb than a dwelling place for dynasties-the people have occupied it nearly as often as their kings:

" Where the poor palace changes masters, And Louis is roll'd out on castors, While Boney's borne on shoulders in."

Bossuet made of the Grand Dauphin an im becile, and Fenelon of the Duke of Burgundy a block-head, but nature it must be added, conributed much towards this character of the pupils. The Prince Imperial lives in other times. and his Governor, General Frossard, is a man of the world. Besides, his father, like the popular Henry the Fourth, has learned the sweet uses of dversity, and has not failed to impress on his on that men are not counters to be played with, that they have eyes, hands, organs, dimensions, enses, passions, affections, like kings, with inelligence at least equal and in cases superior.

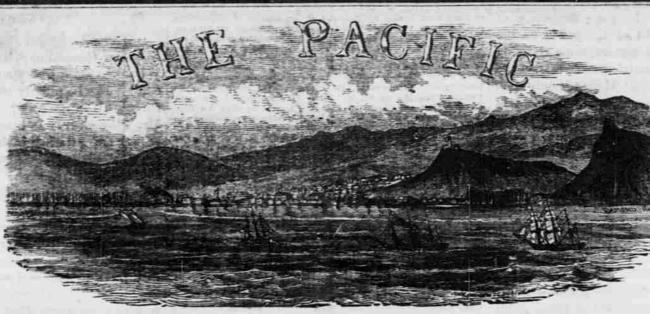

Not a reproach can be made against the Governnent as to the perfect freedom under which the ote of the 8th of May has been taken. The ournals displayed the liberty of the press to the all: and to think that it is hardly a year since M. M. Pinard and Forcade, the Home Ministers, each exclaimed-

"God knows, I love, to ev'n excess, The sacred freedom of the press, My only aim's to 'crush the writers.'

In May last a caucus meeting could not be atlended unless you exhibited your voting card. and run the gauntlet through a cordon of police. Did one stop a moment before the building to atch up a few words of the oratory, three policenen politely begged of you to move on. Now, very one is free to enter the re-unions, voter or on-voter, to unload his heart. That dreaded functionary, the Commissary of Police, instead of taking notes, goes to sleep. The audience may sing the Marseillaise as their doxology, and ery Vive la republique till they are hoarse; no one minds them. A lady occupied the tribune at ne of these meetings a few evenings ago, and ad her say. It is customary to elect as honorary esidents of these assemblies some deceased celebrity. Baudin, in his tomb since 1851, seems to be a favorite. Victor Noir is too recently dead to be the recipient of Jacobin canonization. But then on the foremost head-roll of fame there is Marat, Robespierre, Danton and St. Just.

I have dwelt long on the political situation of his country-for France is now acting history. A nation of forty millions, whose conduct affects Europe, the world cannot be summarily overooked in its throes at the re-birth of liberty; a ation that has made so many sacrifices for xact and equal justice, religious and political, out failed to preserve the benefits of them, is a rofound problem to ponder over. In the 1789 evolution, liberty was strangled by its excesses. The First Napoleon gave but the glories of espotism. Charles the Tenth and Louis Philippe, y their feebleness, allowed liberty to escape their grasp. Personal vanities and visionary schemes prevented the republics from bringing it back. To give France every lawful freedom, to firmly check its eccentricities or abuse, to accustom the people to make their own well-being, each for all, and God for each, is considered to form the true solution of the Government of the

The cold-blooded murders in Greece have evoked very indignant protests against King George's inisters, and much sympathy for the slain.
